When a child gets a base hit, it is like he has conquered the world. They stand at first base and feel they have done it, they have ascended to the summit. They have overcome the odds and hit the ball. In The Greatest Inning Ever Pitched, I talk about overcoming great odds from my personal recollection of my childhood. Everyone has stories, but these are mine. In high school, I landed the job of closer for my varsity baseball team. This means my job was to come into games that we were winning and I was responsible for preserving the win and getting a save. It also means that I was brought into situations late in games when the circumstances had become real bad and I was being called on to pull off a miracle. The odds were often stacked against me when I entered the game and I was relied on to get our team safely out of the inning and secure a victory. As a child I loved the game of baseball as much as any kid could. Like many boys, my career aspirations began and ended with the dream of being a professional baseball player. And why not want to make a career out of a game you loved. At times, I was challenged by the sport to push through adversity, as I was and am, outside the sport. Like many, high school ball was the highest summit I would climb as a player, but the lessons learned can be passed on to the next generation of ball players. I share some of my greatest successes and...
